How Stir Developed on Campus

racism is on the rise and that students from both Ventura and Buena High School, the city's other public high school, attended a white supremacist meeting called by the leader of a local group of skinheads.

Since the attack on Stout and the proposal of the white student union, several students who have sided with either of the groups have been threatened, some students say.

The series of incidents may have started because of misunderstanding about the Black Student Union, school officials said. About a third of its 30 members are not black.

"There were a few kids who didn't know what the club was about and instantly pictured black militancy," said history teacher David Hess, who was Black Student Union adviser when the club was last active in 1989. "They were very threatened. They felt it was a negative deal."

Robert G. Kaufman, editor of the school newspaper, said that if the white club were approved, it might cause more racial violence on campus.

"To the public, the club is saying they want to educate the students, but my opinion is that it is racially motivated," he said. "The black [students are] an underrepresented group and they need some club to show that they're somebody on

Casey White is one of the students who sought permission to begin a white student union at Ventura High School. The request followed the revival of the Black Student Union, members of which include Zaylor Stout and Chandra Crudup at the school. No teacher has stepped forward to sponsor the white students' club, a necessary step before the student council can vote on whether to make the club official.

Splits Along Party Lines

Dantona also formed a nonprofit organization, Baseballers Against Drugs, which recruits major league baseball players to speak to young people about the dangers of drugs.

As a county transportation commissioner he was responsible for putting together an eight-county summit on rail safety in the wake of the train derailment and toxic spill at Sealcliff, he said.

"I'm a hands-on person," he said, "and I will be a hands-on city councilman."

But Stratton and Mikels said Huber has the edge on Dantona because he has served on the council before and has remained active in community organizations and campaigns.

"No one is saying Dantona doesn't have credentials," said Stratton, one of the people who phoned Huber to suggest that he consider trying for a seat on the council. "It just isn't comparable to what Huber has. I've worked with [Huber]. He has a tremendous wealth of knowledge and he is competent."

Stratton said Dantona's ties to Roberti, who is seen as an adherent to the liberal Democratic policies of the past, would probably hurt him more than help him in an area that is predominantly Republican.

"I think one has to ask how his experience in Roberti's office is germane to the city of Simi Valley, which is a conservative Republican community," Stratton said.

Huber, who is partners in a Simi Valley law firm with Russell Takasugi, son of Oxnard Mayor Nao Takasugi, was elected to the City

Robert Huber Jim Dantona

Like Dantona, Huber said he plans to run for the council if not appointed. He said he is ready for a tough campaign battle.

"I don't mind a good horse race," he said. "It's fun."

While Huber and Dantona's names top the list of potential candidates for an appointment to the council, other names have been mentioned. They include Planning Commissioner Dave McCormick and attorney John Williamson, both of whom have run unsuccessfully for the City Council.

McCormick said if the council remains deadlocked over Huber and Dantona, he thinks that he has a good chance of being appointed. If not, he too plans to run next year.

Williamson could not be reached for comment.

The City Council is scheduled to discuss the issue of a council appointment at its Nov. 18 meeting. The panel has 30 days to appoint an interim council member or call a special election to finish McAdoo's term, City Clerk Alice Redondo said. The soonest an election could be held would be April 14, she said.

Despite the expense of an election, council members admit that it may be the best solution.

"That may be the cleanest way to do it," Davis said.
